

The target

is cancer.
The technology is revolutionary.
The state is Indiana.

Endocyte is proof positive that great things can indeed come in small packages—especially when it comes to cancer research. Endocyte began as part of the Purdue Research Park business incubator program and within a few short years has made national headlines for its research and development of a vitamin-targeted anticancer agent. Clinical studies are now showing exciting promise at major medical centers nationwide. Endocyte is just one more shining example of how the life sciences are coming of age in Indiana, where brilliant minds, world-class resources and a supportive environment allow ideas to become reality.
